Unit Overview

Students will study juveniles' responsibilities and rights and how the criminal justice system treats juvenile offenders. Students will learn about juvenile court jurisdiction, police discretion and criminal procedure in juvenile cases. This unit will introduce students to the legal doctrine of parens patriae, meaning “the state as parent.” Students will learn the rights of juveniles during juvenile court hearings and the different ways juvenile courts can disposed of cases. Students will also analyze the basis for trying juveniles as adults.

Enduring Understanding

Based on the belief that juveniles and adults should be treated differently, a separate justice system for juveniles was created in the United States in 1899. New Jersey first began to differentiate between juveniles and adults in 1900. Juveniles were defined as individuals under the age of 18, and delinquency was defined at the time as “any act which, if committed by an adult, would constitute a felony, misdemeanor, municipal ordinance violation or disorderly conduct offense.” The invention of the juvenile court was based on the doctrine of *parens patriae, meaning “the state as parent.” Bent on saving children from becoming criminals, reformers advocated transferring the responsibilities for protecting children from families to special children's courts. A central premise of the juvenile court is that juveniles and adults should be treated differently. It is assumed that adolescents have less responsibility for their acts and need protection. Therefore, it follows that juveniles should receive less than the full adult penalties for their misconduct. Students will consider all issues related to juvenile justice.

Essential Questions

How did the juvenile justice system originate?

What is the jurisdiction of juvenile Courts?

Is incarcerating more juveniles is cost-effective?

Should juveniles be tried as adults?

Should Juvenile courts be abolished?
