Unit Overview

Basic stocks are the base for many different types of sauces and soups. There are five basic sauces called mother, or grand sauces. Other sauces are derivatives of the mother sauces and include compound sauces, independent sauces, and those made from purees, meat juices, and butter. Many sauces are formed from a stock and roux. A roux is the most commonly used thickening agent. Sauces can be adjusted by thickening them or adding seasonings and flavorings. Soups provide both flavor and nutrition. The types of soups are clear, thick and specialty. Presentation and garnishing of soups varies according to their type. Store soups and sauces in tightly sealed containers in cold storage.

Enduring Understanding

- Flavorful stocks are the foundation of sauces and soups.
- A glaze is a stock that has been reduced through the process of evaporation.
- Stocks must be cooled before storage and then transferred to a tight fitting container and placed in refrigeration.
- Sauces should complement the foods they accompany never overpower or detract from the food.
- The five basic sauces are known as mother sauces.
- Roux are thickening agents made from equal amounts of flour and fats used to thicken sauces.
- Soups provide both flavor and nutrition.

Essential Questions

- Is the student able to identify the four elements of a stock and the element proportions?
- Is the student able to explain and demonstrate the process of stock preparation?
- Can the student transform a stock into a glaze through reduction?
- Is the student able to prepare a roux to use as a thickening agent?
- What are the names and preparation techniques of the five mother sauces?
- Is the student able to identify three types of soups and demonstrate the techniques to prepare them?

Exit Skills

Student will be able to:

- identify the elements of a stock in order to produce the foundation of flavorful sauces and soups.
- identify the types of stocks and demonstrate their preparation techniques.
- reduce a stock through evaporation to prepare a glaze.
- remove the fat from stocks by chilling and discarding solid layer of fat before reheating.
- identify ingredients used as thickening agents in a roux and demonstrate the techniques to prepare them.
- explain the similarities and differences of the five mother sauces.
- identify three types of soups and demonstrate the techniques to prepare them.
