Unit Overview

Students will be able to learn about life in the Antebellum North and South. Industry and life in the North as well as the Cotton Kingdom and life in the South will be examined.

Transfer

Students will be able to independently use their learning of life in the Antebellum North and South to better enrich their understanding of the various social backgrounds among people from different places in the United States. Understanding the ways of life of the North and South has developed continuously to the present day and has impacted social and political society during contemporary times. How the political landscape has shifted and how national symbols have become newsworthy and how that relates to this time period will be examined.

Meaning

Understandings

Students will understand that...

- A flood of new inventions in the 1800s aided the growth of industry in the North. Railroads and clipper ships increased both domestic and international commerce.

- Workers formed unions to battle poor conditions in northern factories. Nativists tried to keep immigrants out of the United States. The end of slavery in the North freed African-Americans there.

- The invention of the cotton gin in 1793 helped to make cotton the South's leading crop. The South's economy was dependent on agriculture, not industry.

- The "cottonocracy" that developed in the south strengthened the institution of slavery in that region. Some African-Americans resisted slavery.

Essential Questions

Students will keep considering...

- 1.) Can the causes of the Civil War be traced to sectional differences? Explain your answers.
