African Genocides and Emerging Conflicts

The latter half of the 20th century and into the current period has experienced an increase in genocide on the African continent. The dwindling imperialist ventures by Europeans in Africa left a void in power structure that would cause conflict across the continent. Overthrow of the Somali government in 1991 will lead to conquest and continued conflict in the region. Rwanda will see a rapid increase in violence between Hutus and Tutsis following a Hutu power movement which erupts into genocide in April 1994. The Arab state sponsored Janjaweed in the Sudan will target native black villages in the Darfur region for the entirety of the modern period. Outside of Africa, growing tensions and destabilization in the Middle East will cause the growth of terror organizations in nations like Syria spurring the world's worst modern humanitarian crisis to date.

The Rohingya, a Muslim minority in Burma, will be placed in internment camps after growing hate speech and dehumanization by the government. Genocidal events will continue to occur into the 21st century and will be covered in this unit they arise and are listed as early warning signs of genocide by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum.
